

Money Honey

Charles Lindbergh provided to Congress a Banker's Manifesto where a statement is to be paraphrased, "it matters not who is elected to office so long as the banks control the money, Amstel Rothschild." The Rothschild's do exist but carry not the power of money as the "too big to fail" banks carry. Do the banks really carry the money or has it become that as seen debt has the value of money, Therefore is it possible to rephrase the statement made in the Banker's Manifesto to "it matters not who is elected so long as I control the debt?"

Yes this writer did state "I" as was done for a reason that will be shortly explained.

One has to inquire of the length of time the tangible recovery rate will cover the intangible debt. If the world's Gross Domestic Product is approximately in 2013 was 75.19 Trillion and with concluding that 50% of the gross domestic product is available for paying the 57 Trillion one mathematical could see that without adding any further debt that 3 years would be needed for the tangible return of money to cover the intangible appetite of money. Appetite, yes that is an "I" factor, me, me, me, now, now, now need all the money, what a monster of an appetite, Will there become a day when the tangible money will not be here to quell an intangible appetite for more money; this writer would have to conclude that the answer would be yes, when is another question. Logic dictates that if one attempts to sustain a solid with a fluid, something wet shall hit the ground, looking negatively at the glass, we ask not which would get filled, one should be asking when will there be nothing visible to put in the glass.

For those in the legal field, something to ponder; if one commits civil act and gets caught, how hard would it now be to prove the criminal element, does Ultra Vires arrogate for a paycheck or for the biggest glass get in the way?

Very easy to see, ground the people into the mud so deep that they have not the money to fight evil, Alas, a belief that evil stands tall, against God, get real!

Why Choose Poorly?
